is a comedy film written

A new study published in the journal Clinical Otolaryngology — Head and Neck Surgery indicates that doctors' offices across the nation may not be as safe as they believe. The study claims that the number of pediatric emergency room visits resulting from antibiotic-resistant Staphylococcus aureus

(MRSA) infections is increasing at a rate not seen since the 1980s. The study, which was conducted by researchers at Boston Children's Hospital, the University of Pittsburgh, Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, the University of Virginia, and Children's Hospital of Wisconsin, involved a comparison of emergency room visits from 1993 through 2002. Researchers examined 1.1

million children who had MRSA-related ER visits to a pediatric hospital and determined that the number of visits almost doubled. The researchers also determined that physicians' offices were the most common locations of the "most severe" MRSA infections and those that were attributed to younger children. They concluded that doctors' offices and treatment centers were responsible for about half of all MRSA-related ER visits, which would make them the ideal spot to prevent MRSA from developing. The researchers said that antibiotics given to children can shorten the time it takes MRSA to develop into a more serious, life-threatening infection. Because of this, they noted that the number of MRSA-related ER visits among children is a clear indicator of whether or not doctors are providing appropriate treatment. “MRSA is a highly dangerous bacteria, and what we’ve found is that it’s taking hold in our society more quickly than we thought,” said Leonard Bonomo, Ph.D., pediatric emergency physician at the Children’s Hospital of Pittsburgh and coauthor of the study. “But we have an opportunity to take steps to slow down this infection and help doctors and families make smart decisions to protect children against this urgent public health threat.”
