Version 1803 Build .October 21, 2013 Criminal Justice News | U.S. Senate Committee on Judiciary Discusses 'Shameful', 'Troubling' Record of State-Level Parole Revocations By a vote of 9-3, the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary approved three bipartisan amendments aimed at giving states more time and process during which to review parole revocation decisions, and automatically restoring most parolees to parole once they have served the primary term of imprisonment. Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-IA), the committee's chairman, introduced the amendments in September as part of a crime-focused crime bill called the Justice Safety Valve Act. The original bill would have raised the number of inmates who would be eligible for early release from prison by more than 50 percent. But a number of Republican senators, including Grassley, and Democratic Sen. Mike Lee (Utah), opposed extending eligibility. "You can have conversations around policy without having someone

think their life is at risk,” Grassley said at the time. He said the amendments were “common-sense solutions” to a problem of unfairly, and arbitrarily, making millions of incarcerated Americans ineligible to be released early. “The last time anyone tried to change the current system, it was the work of a young Illinois senator named Barack Obama,” Grassley told the committee. “And now, the record is even more shameful. So I think it’s time to change course.” At a time when it is moving to expand its network of private prisons, the U.S. government is moving to strip parole and furlough options from thousands of prisoners every year. In a brief and narrow vote, the committee approved an amendment by Sen. Dick Durbin (D-IL) that would require the Bureau of Prisons to maintain the number of community supervision officers and state probation officers and public defenders. “This is about providing people with options and opportunities to have a safe release back into society,” said Durbin. “There are nearly 10,000 people in prisons who have served their sentences and can’t
