the left channel and right channel enable you to create different variations of the channels. i use this to create a base track, and then make variations of that track to mimic the songs i like, while maintaining the time signature and key. studio one also offers several sophisticated tools that allow you to extract audio and midi parts. you can import material from other media, and save your own audio and midi files. plugins are available for common effects, including reverb, delay, chorus, flanger, and others. more than 30 instruments are available, including synths, drums, and guitars. finally, you can add midi notation and automation as you go. now, if youre using your computer as a controller, it will be reading the automation data from the interface. the first time you open your project, the automation for your track may not be immediately visible. on the project page, youll see two track ins. in the tracks panel, youll see the name of your track, and the automation for that track. the controls panel will have two boxes, one for each of the channels. the automation will be in the box that corresponds to the left channel, right channel, or both. the boxes will be described in the following sections. if you need to view the automation in another program, you can export the automation from studio one, and then import it into the other program. im sure this will be a topic for many other sections of this site. i look forward to discussing other topics with you. on the right side of the panels panel, select track. the tracks panel will show the name of your track, and the automation for that track. now select track, and select the automation for the left channel. in the first box, you can choose the left channel for your automation. you can also choose the right channel, or both. this will set the panning for that channel. for my purposes, i choose to use all of the automation for my left channel. if youre using the right channel, you can use the lfos and filters to control the panning.
