the first reason for an engines choice is definitely dependent on the type of game you want to create. to start with, we got visual log, with which you can create programs with c/c++ commands and the software will convert your c/c++ to a program that runs on the ps2. in some cases, the conversion can be almost one to one, but in most cases you will have to revise your code or use logic in your program. for this particular version of the game, i chose to use the visual log 2 by xian a. sun, the creator of html5. using html5, you can create a web page and easily program games with javascript and use commands and transform them for the ps2. by using html5, we can create really complex games. a disadvantage though is that this software has a limit of 10 enemies in the screen, but there are several ways to overcome it. in my case, i used some command from my own script file to trigger a new enemy which i had created and added to the game. normally, i use game maker to create games on the ps2, but i found it to be too big and limited for my needs. you can use game maker - studio or the gm 6 to create small games, but it is not really compatible with flash games(only text and graphic files). and like everything else, there are other engines available too. the graphical engines are invasion studio and wurbox. invasion studio is great for creating flash games, but there are no commands to add more enemies. wurbox also is great for creating flash games, but it requires you to create the game on your own (code, graphics, etc). so, in a sense, we can say that you can use any engine to create any kind of game you can imagine.

ok. lets start working on our fighting game. at first, im gonna show you the most simple interface to make a simple opponent. this will be our basic enemy ai, but in the future i will go more in depth into how to improve enemy ai. on the left, we have our screen, and on the right side our stats, input and action buttons. the screen is divided in two parts. the left is where we have our status: our opponent health state, our own health state and a counter to show how many blocks our dealing with our opponent. at the top of our screen we have the distance between us and our opponent, on the right side of the screen we have several counters which, at the time of this recording, will show how many stuns or damage we did. the stats of our character are: his speed which shows how far we can go in one block, and his mp (maximum potential) in percent, meaning how many blocks we can deal with at one time, without running out of energy to deal with our opponent. this is the case of cast. chuck can store one block for two types of attacks: air (anti-air) and ground (anti-ground) attack. from now on, the number in the name of the states are the respective effects, the state in the name is the general state effect. (e.g: 5 punch = 5% strength & 5% spirit). Sec8ef588b
