What does my baby need? In our first trimester, you may feel completely exhausted and could actually think that you need a break. Now you can feel more energetic and ready to tackle pregnancy. Around the second trimester, the tiredness will start to kick in again. In your second trimester, you'll begin to develop the urge to eat more often. Why is my baby growing so big? This is called "placenta previa" The placenta is what connects your baby to your womb and is not fully developed until the eighth week of your pregnancy. For some women, this means the placenta covers the cervix, meaning it could stop your baby from being born. If this happens, your baby can only be delivered by caesarean section. Early symptoms of this condition include:

- bleeding between the vagina and the cervix
- back or chest pain
- heavy or painful periods

If this occurs, you should see a doctor. Your doctor may need to do a scan to find out if your baby is growing properly. Your doctor will also check your blood pressure to see if you're gaining too much weight. Your doctor will also measure your baby's length and head circumference and check your heartbeat. The first trimester is also a time when you're developing your baby's brain and nervous system. There's a good chance that you may be feeling tired during the first trimester because your baby is not ready to be born. Your baby needs around 20 hours sleep a day, so if you're not getting enough of that, it could cause you to feel tired. Do you know what your baby's gender is? You can get the gender of your baby by using an "amniocentesis" (a test which is performed on the amniotic fluid in your womb). This test checks the sex of your baby. Some women choose not to do this, because there are also risks to the procedure. During the second trimester
